The Monteur of Paris gives the following detail of the proceedings of the expedition against the Kabyles, on both sides of the Oued-Agrion, the Governor General commanding one column, and General MacMahon the other:

"Gen. Randon was occupied on the 20th ult. in chastising a fraction of the Rhabamin, in the vicinity of the Beni-Tisi. The enemy had nine men killed, and all the villages burnt down, and the French four men killed. On the 21st he proceeded with all his force to the hill of Tisi-Sakka, which the Kabyles appeared resolved to defend.—The impetuosity of the attack by the French was, however, so great that the Kabyles gave way almost immediately, leaving this important post in possession of the French, who could from it corresponding with the division of Gen. MacMahon, which was only four leagues to the right. This success only cost the French some wounded; but after the main attack a skirmish took place between a company of the ninety-eighth regiment and a body of Kabyles, in which 7 of the latter were killed, and one of the French had also four men wounded.

"On the 22d Gen. Randon attacked the village of another fraction of the Beni-Tisi, and carried them without much resistance, the enemy leaving behind them forty men dead, the French not having a single man wounded. The result of these successes was, that on the 24th the principal chiefs of the neighboring tribes came to the General's camp and offered their submission on whatever conditions the French might think fit to impose. Intelligence of the division of Gen. MacMahon states that on the 23d he had a sharp encounter with Kabyles, who left not less than sixty men dead on the field. He had skirmishes every day from the 10th, but without leading to the decisive results attained by the division of the Governor-General.

"It was thought, however, that the affair of the 23d would have the effect of inducing the Kabyles to whom Gen. MacMahon is opposed to send in their submission. Several minor affairs are also mentioned as having taken place at other places, and in all cases to the advantage of the French troops. One of these affairs took place on the 23d, when between 500 and 600 Kabyles attacked a body of engineers who were engaged in widening the road leading to the east towards Tisi-M'Longout. The sharpshooters who served as their protection, were forced back, and Captain Gremelin, who was in command was severely wounded. The Sub-Lieutenant, Pape, who then assumed the command, was killed. The only remaining officer, Abd-el-Kader-el-Bidhi, rallied the troops, and not being able to resist the great force of the enemy, effected a retreat in good order, but with rather severe loss.

"The Kabyles, on seeing another body of men issuing against them from General MacMahon's camp, which was not a mile distant, dispersed at once. The loss of the French in this affair, independently of Lieut. Pape, was three men killed, and thirty-five wounded, among whom were four officers. The enemy had twenty-one killed and forty wounded, and among the dead were two influential chiefs. The next day a party of the French, by a circuitous way, got to the rear of the Kabyles, and while another party attacked them in front, assailed them with the bayonet from the other side, and killed fifty-one.

"The French only lost one man, a trumpeter of the third regiment of Zouaves, who was struck with a ball in the temple while sounding the charge. Thus both divisions were advancing steadily towards the lower Oued-Agrion, where they were to meet ultimately. A telegraph despatch from the Governor General completes this information, by stating that on the 29th he was to move forward from the camp of Tisi-Sakka, and that Gen. MacMahon was to do the same on his side. The despatch adds that all tribes had sent in their submission, furnished hostages, and paid tribute, so that the first part of the expedition may be looked on as terminated. The rest of Algeria enjoyed a profound peace."

How it works.—The Marshall Guard comfort the Democratic brethren in this wise:

We heard down from our dear head the name of John J. McLean, Van Hookdale, and Van H. Muse. McLean drew up the celebrated resolutions of Congress against Gen. Pape, and made no statement for the same. Hookdale had no more to say than to call attention, by the name of the Democratic party, to the fact that the Democratic party of this State and of the Union at this moment, than there has been for years before. It requires patience, caution and discretion, to preserve the territory, and its democracy.
